Although vaginal breech delivery has been practiced for centuries, recent studies have shown that it is not an outdated procedure. Recent studies report a 4% cesarean section rate for vaginal breech delivery, less than one half of the 10-12% cesarean section rate for vaginal cephalic breech delivery. Nearly all the trials that have looked at the cesarean section rate for vaginal breech delivery are short term, and would not be considered minimum data sets for a high-risk trial because of the lack of outcome measures. However, multiple studies have shown that vaginal breech delivery is associated with lower maternal and neonatal morbidity and mortality compared with cesarean section. A recent cesarean section rate of 7% with similar outcomes is comparable to what is reported for primary cesarean section. Training now is directed at more than the knowledge or skills needed to deliver a cesarean section, but should consider training the psychomotor skills and attitudes needed to perform the procedure. Women are often frightened and unhappy with cesarean section. Vaginal breech delivery offers some benefits to patients and should be offered to women who may not be candidates for primary cesarean delivery. Training programs should become more inclusive and offer a wider range of options so that all women's needs can be met.Q:
