It's one thing to squeeze a bunch of new features into an older version, and it's entirely another to abandon Photographers that are starving for new features in favor of those who aren't. Adobe is replacing you with the engineers who are writing the AI instead of you. What does this week's update bring to Photoshop? Well, the latest release of Adobe Sensei AI has taken its first step into the realm of Photoshop. As a part of the Photoshop 2019 release, Adobe Photoshop has trained AI to recognize objects in your image and an underlying motion analysis tool recognizes different types of motion that could be happening in your image. The result? A new feature that allows you to detect a subtle blur in your images (think "blurry lens"), detect motion, and even recognize objects (think "dog from Halloween"). So what does Photoshop have? Specifically, we've boosted our Cooling Reduction technology to make your images much more forgiving of the noise you've already captured. New Healing brushes (and new Action Study brush) make it easy to quickly scale and remove repetitive localized objects or complex patterns. Calibrating a projector can make your images look better on a wide display (probably much better than what the designers intended). In many ways, Adobe's Photographers are always one step away from the section that is required to create PSD. In fact, it seems that Adobe never allows Photoshop Photographers to get too far from Photoshop. In fact, it's been years since I've seen a Photoshop Photographers video that accurately demonstrates how to do something Photoshop. Except a few years ago, Adobe wouldn't allow Photoshop Photographers to take advantage of separately authored actions (RAW file) within Photoshop.
